Chapter 2 by Harlander

Guy, or, to give him his full name, Guido Alighieri, was having a pretty chill time. Not a lot of people lived in the place once known as Italy since most of the human race had gone to live on the giant orbiting space stations, or the new colonies on other planets.

It had been decided that Earth would become a garden world, to return to the state it was in before industrial civilisation. Guido was one of the few thousand people who had remained to live out the rest of their lives helping clean up the world.

Chapter 4 by Bryson Dunsmore

We were forced to fend off against the animals every day to help protect our area of restoration on the planet, but the animals had been becoming stronger and stronger after dwelling in an environment where they are at the top of the food chain, so it was becoming very hard to keep them away. People were dying day after day until there was only 60 out of the 2,000 left, me being a "lucky" one of them. We were trying to create new blueprints for defense when we heard a hard thump on the roof, and what we saw shocked us. There was a capsule from the other people, and inside there was a note that said-"We have established that, due to our expectations of Earth being restored at a much faster pace, we will be sending in a new lot of 3,000 people to help speed up the process."

Chapter 5 by Bryson Dunsmore

When the news spread among our people, we essentially had a party. We gathered together and lined up crates for tables. We also got out lots of food and had a celebratory feast. That was a big mistake. The animals, now having overly acute senses of smell, easily smelled our food. First, we heard banging on the walls. Some of us thought that the new lot of people had arrived, but most of us knew that wasn't the case. Then, we heard foot steps on the roof. We all tried to be as quiet as possible. After awhile, it sounded like the animals had gone away, but as we were trying to repackage the food, we heard a small noise moving under our feet. Some of us volunteered to follow the noise, me being one of them, to see what it was.
